One by one, children shuffled through the line, meeting their designated volunteer and setting off on a journey most kids dream about.

These youngsters were inside the Clovis, New Mexico, K-Mart store, equipped with a $125 budget and given free reign to shop as they wished.

The event was a part of the annual Christmas Shopping Spree held by Hobbs Eagles #3189 and Clovis #3245 to benefit area children in need.

In Hobbs, I was paired with 10-year-old David. David was full of energy and headed straight to the toy aisle, picking through a variety of toys related to the popular video game “Minecraft.”

With each new item placed inside our cart, David kept a running total of his remaining budget and upon discovering he had a surplus left after grabbing his desired items, he ran off to the toy car aisle, grabbing a few packs of Hot Wheels cars for his little brother.

We purchased David’s items, then waited in line along with him and the other children who had finished.

The kids laughed, smiled, showed off their toys and offered the clearest view of what it really means to be an Eagle.

Their enthusiasm for the spree and the generosity shown to them by these Eagles was evident throughout.

the morning. Hours later, we headed to a local grocery store, where approximately 10 area families were treated to $300 worth of groceries for the holiday season.

The following morning, we woke up in Clovis and headed over to the Wal-Mart for another wonderful day of giving back. Upon walking in, we noticed a line which stretched from the front door to the back wall of the massive store. We quickly learned the line was made up of servicemen and women from the local Air Force base who had made the 6 a.m. trek to help assist Clovis’ disadvantaged youth.

The response from these men and women was a sight to behold. Each paired up with their child and journeyed throughout the store picking out toys, clothing, movies and more.

I spent that morning traversing the store with a 10-year-old girl named Claudia. She was shy and lacked the assertiveness of the boy the day before, but she came armed with a clipboard which listed at least one item for each member of her family. Her grandfather loved cookies, so she headed straight for the Chips Ahoy. Her aunt loved brownies, so she grabbed a nice little cast-iron skillet set with brownie mix. Soon the cart was filled with a movie for her sister, a puzzle for her brother, and more gifts for the family.

We spent the final 30 minutes of our trip running around the store in search for a mermaid tail blanket - the only item the girl actually wanted for herself. Finally, we found the blanket, checked out and helped her carry the items out to the bus. With a maxed out budget of $150, our assigned child had only a $10 mermaid blanket for herself. The Clovis trip provided us with a real look at what this event means to these kids.

Claudia had expressed to us that if she didn’t pick out at least one item for everyone, there was a chance they may not receive anything for Christmas - something she was determined to prevent from happening.

Throughout each year, I have the honor of taking many of the amazing fundraising stories passed along by our Aeries and Auxiliaries and sharing them with the outside public and with our other members.

However, the opportunities to go out and be a part of these great events first hand are few and far between. To spend two days with the fine members of the state of New Mexico and watch as their year-long fundraising efforts pay off with great enthusiasm over the course of two fast-moving mornings was an experience I will never forget.

I encourage all of our members to consider putting on a similar event in December 2017 and help us make the holiday season brighter for children across the entire jurisdiction. There’s no better way to show your community what People Helping People is truly all about.

Fraternally,
Zack Timmons, Grand Aerie Marketing Director
